 Article 1 (ข้อที่ 81-85)

The growing popularity of electric vehicles (EVs) has made a significant impact on the automotive industry. Over the past few years, more car manufacturers have shifted their focus to producing electric cars due to environmental concerns and the rising demand for sustainable transportation. Governments around the world have also introduced policies to encourage the use of EVs, such as tax incentives and the development of charging infrastructure.

Despite the rapid growth, challenges still remain, such as the high cost of electric vehicles and the limited range of some models. However, advancements in battery technology and efforts to expand charging networks are expected to address these concerns. As EVs continue to evolve, they are expected to become more affordable and accessible to a broader population.

81. What has driven the increase in electric vehicle (EV) production?

- a) Decreasing demand for gasoline cars.
- b) The popularity of hybrid vehicles.
- c) Environmental concerns and demand for sustainable transportation.
- d) Lower manufacturing costs.

82. What role have governments played in the rise of electric vehicles?

- a) They have prohibited the use of gasoline cars.

 Article 3 (ข้อที่ 91-95)

Tariffs are taxes imposed on imported goods and are used by governments to protect local industries from foreign competition. In the United States, tariffs are a key part of international trade policy. The U.S. government uses tariffs to encourage domestic production and to protect jobs in certain sectors, such as steel and manufacturing. However, tariffs can also lead to higher prices for consumers, as imported goods become more expensive. In recent years, there has been significant debate about the effectiveness of tariffs, with some arguing that they harm consumers and disrupt global supply chains, while others believe they are necessary for protecting national industries.

91. What is the main purpose of tariffs in the United States?
